ELLANEOUS READING. THE WINTER'S GONE. (Diffugere Nives-Horace.)

[rom the New York Evening Post.] The winter's gone, and fast the snows are going: Green in the meadows now the grass is growing; All o'er the trees the leafy locks are springing: All o'er the world is Spring her changes bringing. The streams, their banks no longer overflowing, In milder, calmer mood are gently going. Forth to the dance come Nymphs and sister Grad In unclad beauty and with joyous faces.

The hour, so kind, yet fleeting, warns thee plainly.

Mortal, to be immortal, hope not vainly! The warm west wind removes all winter's traces; oon summer, in its turn, the spring effaces; And quick shall change the summer's radiant glory, To autumn's lavish fruits and winter hoary. Yet the swift months, to change perpetual tending Their own disasters still are ever mending; But when the winter-death our life shall sever, No spring shall raise the lifeless dust forever. To-day thy hopes are bright, thy joys are certain-What hand can lift to morrow's gloomy curtain? Seize the glad hour, and sate thy soul with pleasure.

Nor leave to greedy heirs thy hard-earned treasure When once the silver chord is rudely broken-When once stern fate the hard decree bath spoken-No long array of noble names before thee, Nor eloquence nor virtue shall restore thee. Their modest worth in gloomy shades is dwelling, Its prayer, unheard, no kind release compelling, And valor falls before that foe unquailing, With arm unnerved and weapon unavailing.

THE MOSQUITO.

A writer in Harper's Magazine for April gives the following description of the Mosquito, which should have a place in the next work

"The mosquito is an offensive, venomous species of insect. He abides in swamps and But of what possible use he is I wot not, unless it be as a model of industry and perseverance."
